Pharmakon

Pharmakon, in philosophy and critical theory, is a composite of three meanings: remedy, poison, and scapegoat. The first and second senses refer to the everyday meaning of pharmacology (and to its sub-field, toxicology), deriving from the Greek source term φάρμακον (phármakon), denoting any drug, while the third sense refers to the pharmakos ritual of human sacrifice.

The Pharmakon are a faction introduced in January 2019, consisting of sentient A.I.s. Their hulls are highly advanced and are capable of phasing in and out of combat. Pharmakon Hulls are designed to counter Umbra Hulls, but are weak to Altairian Hulls, marking the end of a circle of factions that emphasise a rock-paper-scissors effect.

Pharmākos, in Greek religion, a human scapegoat used in certain state rituals. In Athens, for example, a man and a woman who were considered ugly were selected as scapegoats each year. At the festival of the Thargelia in May or June, they were feasted, led round the town, beaten with green twigs, and driven out or killed with stones. The practice in Colophon, on the coast of Asia Minor (the ...

Sold as a Pharmakon concert, we saw two bands that opened the show play for almost an hour each, and when Pharmakon came in, she played for 25 minutes (3 songs only). The concert would have been great, had the musician actually played anything. She is indeed a fantastic musician, but this bad joke cannot be called a concert.

A grimy excursion into the worlds of noise/power electronics/death industrial, Pharmakon is the project of New York-based performer Margaret Chardiet. Mixing slow, churning beats with abrasive blasts of synthesizers and her own anguished screams, the project blends noise's confrontational qualities without completely abandoning musicality. This gives Pharmakon a sound that, while harsh and ...
